PUBLICATIONS. The two most significant writing pieces, in terms of sheer volume, include my published 500-page dissertation, entitled: "Experiencing Restorative Justice Practices in the Context of an Academic Course -- A Phenomenological Mixed Methods Study (2012)" and the 575-page "Wisconsin Domestic Violence Prosecution Manual, 2004" for which I served as the editor and main author.

My dissertation is available on-line, UMI Number 3517721, copyright 2012, published by ProQuest, Ann Arbor, Michigan. Included with this application is an electronic version of my dissertation. While dissertation research and writing is of a different nature than legal research and writing, I would like my dissertation to be considered as an added document to my application.

The Domestic Violence Prosecution Manual, 2004, shared best practices for handling complicated domestic abuse cases with prosecutors throughout the state. The publication was the product of two full years of work researching statutes, judicial decisions, national publications and resources, as well as the policies and procedures which could best aid prosecutors to hold domestic abuse offenders accountable in Wisconsin. Following publication of the manual, I organized a multi-disciplinary team to train at State Prosecutor Education Training (SPET) Winter and Summer conferences and SPET luncheon lectures offering legal opinions on a range of domestic abuse topics. The manual was most recently and graciously updated by the Wisconsin Department of Justice and several prosecutors throughout the state. Entitled the "Wisconsin Prosecutor's Domestic Abuse Reference Book (2012)", I served as a senior advisor to the project. Both documents are available for your review, upon request.
